And it's also led to some memorable moments. Last week, the Spurs announced that Parker's injury at the end of Game 2 of the Finals was a fracture in his tibia and fibula (the bones in the lower part of his right leg), and a new surgery was planned to remove the bone from his knee. It would be a deep operation. At the time, the Spurs didn't believe that it would be season-ending, but that's been the case in recent years for many players who have torn cartilage in their right knee in the NBA Finals and season. Jalen Rose is a perfect example. He tore his right meniscus in 2001 against the Los Angeles Lakers, then had two surgeries on the same knee, then his career ended because of recurring knee problems. Again, a strong guy and someone who is constantly giving it his all, but someone who got what he deserved. Parker isn't anywhere close to that, but since the NBA is the only place he's ever played, he's been focused and deliberate. He's been the kind of competitor who doesn't think he's better than anybody, and is more than willing to ask for the ball, pull down rebounds or get through screens. But if he's knocked off balance, if he doesn't hit his stride or he's forced to modify his game, he gets worked up and frustrated. The first surgery, and Parker's return in Game 4 of the Finals against the Los Angeles Clippers, gave him an opportunity to figure out what he was capable of doing, how fast he could f678ea9f9e
