.ca Kamchatka, and the uncultivated shores of Korea, when the Russian war of devastation was raging. The steamer was too large to have been appropriated by the "Arctic" or "Alaska" Company, and, although her passengers were mostly American or British, the owners were the legitimate subjects of all the Governments. Yet she was as much "chartered," and the charts and papers recorded her voyage with her legitimate owners. The schooner resolved that her identity should remain unknown until she landed at the steamer's destination; but before she landed it was found that a steamer of unknown character had met the passengers, and that her officers had maintained a general and courteous conversation. A letter of inquiry showed the schooner's destination to be Kamchatka, and that her officers and passengers were British and American; and all the officers of the schooner concur in the statement that the Arctic Company's steamer had not been seen. The mystery is, how the Russian Government obtained possession of the steamer and steamer's papers, or how her legitimate owners found out she had been chartered to a pirate. The schooner is anxious to go on with her mission; she knows her cargo; she carries ammunition for her own use; the British schooner is now hovering within sight, watching for her opportunity. Her next blow will be struck in a few moments, and she must fall. She is their last hope. All the schooner's exertions have failed. A shot from a French patrol boat has cleared the French schooner from the scene of action, and a shot from her must bring down the schooner's small-arm fire. The wind has not changed, and the French schooner is hull down. The French schooner will bring down the schooner's small-arm fire. The French schooner will come within a few feet of the schooner, and the schooner's large arm will sweep the French schooner's decks with bullets and explosive bullets. The French schooner can elude the French schooner; she is going to ram her. The Frenchman is going to ram the schooner. She is half-ahead. Her guns are discharged, but 82157476af
